Victor Hugo described Fougères as a "place where artists ought to flock like pilgrims" and Balzac described it as the "flower of Brittany". In mediaeval times it was a military post of great significance, and the 12th century moated castle, around which the town has developed over generations, still stands as a focal point and reminder of bygone days. With its 13 towers, the impressive fortress is one of the best conserved mediaeval castles in Europe. Fougères' major monument is a medieval stronghold built on top a granite ledge, which was part of the ultimately unsuccessful defence system of the Duchy of Brittany against French aggression, and part of a tripartate with Vitré and Châteaubriant. A sizable section of the town walls survive stretching from the château in the lower town up the hill to surround the upper town. During the Middle Ages, salt was heavily taxed and was imported from the Breton regions to the rest of France. Fougères was made a stronghold for "salt smugglers," who would creep along the wall of the city with confiscated salt, to sell in other regions. There is a communal garden in modern Fougères that commemorates this interesting and little known fact. The church of Saint Sulpice, in the lower part of the town, was built in the mid 11th century and is a late Flamboyant Gothic building whose walls are highly and elaborately decorated with convoluted exterior displays of strange and savage gargoyles. Notre-Dame-de-Bonabry, built in 1893 in the Romanesque and Byzantine style was built to serve the owners and workers of shoe factories in the centre of which it was built.
